Red Leaves is a crime novel that looks at the repercussions of the crime, as much as it does the crime itself. Eric Moore has it all, a happy marriage to a loving and successful wife, Meredith, a stable, caring teenage son, a thriving business in a quiet town, the only negative aspect of Eric's life is his troubled brother, Warren, a loner who lives by a school.

BookLore Review - Red Leaves by Thomas H Cook

"Family photos always lie," is the first line of Red Leaves, Thomas Cook's stunning new novel about a family under pressure. The eloquent narrator, Eric Moore, owns a camera and photo shop and photography is a motif that permeates the novel.

Thomas H. Cook : Red Leaves : Book Review

RED LEAVES will show you why." Peter Straub says, "Thomas Cook writes like a wounded angel, and RED LEAVES is one of his masterworks. Sorrow, suspicion, fear, and forgiveness hang suspended over an almost unbearably increasing tension." Interesting is Cook's choice of epigraph, which is from Pulitzer Prize winner Stephen Dunn's "Visiting The Master."

Red Leaves by Thomas H Cook I can't remember when I bought Red Leaves, but wrote last October that it had then been in my unread shelves for a while. Stimulated by Lizzy's comment on our Revish crime-fiction reading list that it is the best crime-fiction book she's ever read, I decided to give it a whirl.
